Critical Incident Debriefing

Mary M. Smith

Critical Incident Debriefing:

Critical Incident Debriefing Frank Parkinson,1997 First developed in the USA in the 1980s Critical Incident Debriefing is a structured procedure which enables those who have been involved in a violent and traumatic incident to work through the experience and come to terms with it Critical Incident Stress Debriefing Jeffrey T. Mitchell,George S. Everly,2001

Critical Incident Stress Debriefing Mary M. Smith,2022 Healthcare providers especially those working in emergency and intensive care settings are frequently exposed to traumatic experiences These experiences affect their emotional physical psychological or spiritual well being This integrated review analyzed the effectiveness of Critical Incident Stress Debriefing CISD as an intervention for emergency healthcare providers secondary to exposure of traumatic events in their clinical practice Fifteen 15 articles and journals using the PRISMA model searching for evidence supporting the application of CISD in managing the effects of traumatic experiences by emergency healthcare providers were reviewed The research showed that emergency healthcare workers mitigate stress in multiple ways The non mandatory and formalized CISD process is open to the staff involved and facilitated by trained professionals It is designed to offer an open non judgmental setting where those involved may express their feelings with the goal to avoid internalization of the feelings and stress surrounding the incident while reinforcing that the individual is not alone in experiencing this stress and emotions Working in emergency medicine increases the likelihood of exposure to frequent critical incidents which may lead to Post Traumatic Stress Disorder s PTSD This integrated review supports the use of CISD for helping healthcare providers working in emergency medicine cope with the challenge of being exposed to trauma and the related effects Keywords traumatic experiences critical incidents debriefing psychological emergency Elements of Critical Incident Debriefing John M. Assessment for the Tulsa Fire Department William E. Goswick,Tulsa. Fire Department,1990 The problem is that fire departments need to evaluate the potential effects of critical incident stress on members and develop effective strategies for a planned response when critical incidents occur A critical incident stress needs assessment was identified as a logical first step in the development of a planned response to this problem It was determined that a very high incidence of exposure to critical incidents exists among the members of the Tulsa Fire Department who completed the survey and that those members had experienced a high incidence of reactions to one or more of those incidents Two recommendations were made for dealing with the risks associated with critical incident stress on the Tulsa Fire Department as well as in the fire service Pre incident training and education concerning critical incident stress and the development of a critical incident stress debriefing CISD team program were recommended to address the problem Identifying Established Critical Incident Stress
