

HOW TO CONDUCT INTERVIEWS FOR RESEARCH

WHAT ARE INTERVIEWS?

Interviewing used as a research method is a technique that collects firsthand experiences from people and helps researchers better understand attitudes, behaviors, opinions, and related information. Interviews provide rich, story-driven accounts of events and feelings.

WHEN SHOULD I CONDUCT INTERVIEWS FOR RESEARCH?

Use interviewing in research when it is valuable to collect firsthand accounts and life experiences of people. Conduct interviews when you want to understand a person's or people's interactions with a particular event, time period, or product.

STEP ONE Recruit Participants	STEP TWO Establish Recording Method	STEP THREE Develop Questions	STEP FOUR Interview Participants	STEP FIVE Conduct Further Research
 Determine what it is you hope to learn from interviewing and identify the people that will provide you the richest data and information possible. Scope of interviewing can vary widely, so determine an effective number of people to interview in advance. If the questions you are going to ask are sensitive in nature, be sure to let interviewees know this in advance, obtain IRB (institutional review board) approval when interviewing on sensitive topics or when interviewing children.	 Interviews can be recorded in a number of ways. Commonly, interviewers will record using a phone app or other audio recording device. You may also wish to videotape the interview, or simply take copious notes. Regardless of method, be sure that you obtain permission from each interviewee—in written format—before conducting the interview.	 Determine whether it is best to conduct a structured interview or an unstructured interview (see explanations at the far right). Develop questions that will provide rich and useful information. Avoid closed, yes/no questions. Rather, ask questions that will provide opportunity for interviewees to express feelings, attitudes, behaviors, opinions, perceptions, and so forth. Avoid leading questions. Questions that make people feel or think a certain way before they have a chance to answer!	 Set down with interviewees in a safe space where they feel comfortable and relaxed. Start with small talk to get them comfortable with you and talking out loud. If you are going unstructured interviews, have your topics ready, but be prepared to have an open dialog with interviewees and ask follow-up questions when responses create interesting insights. When conducting structured interviews, be sure to stick to the questions and ask exactly the same questions to all interviewees.	 Interviews are typically best when conducted to one piece of a larger research initiative. Much like a focus group, interviews give rich, insightful, albeit anecdotal evidence about how people feel, and act. Interviews provide persuasive insights and direct quotes from people who "were there." However, interviews are not typically quantifiable and should be supplemented with questionnaires, observations, and other research.

UNSTRUCTURED INTERVIEWS

Unstructured interviews are interviews where questions may vary from one interviewee to another. In other words, you are having an open dialogue and you as the interviewer will modify the questions based on how people respond. Even though these interviews are less structured, the interviewer should still be prepared with a list of topics and have a clear sense of the type of information they are trying to learn from the interviewee.

Unstructured interviews are best when trying to capture anecdotal evidence to learn generally about different people's experiences. They are good for capturing stories and lived insights. They are not good, however, if you are trying to learn consensus or patterns between people.

STRUCTURED INTERVIEWS

Structured interviews are interviews where questions remain exactly the same between all interviewees. Questions must be asked in the same way, using the same words. If follow-up questions are asked, they are typically saved until the end, and they are not compared to the responses from other interviewees.

Structured interviews are best when interviewing many people to better understand trends across a spectrum of people. Structured interviews are more likely to be quantified and measured and can be repeated, an important piece of scientific measurement and statistical correlation.
