

The Life of Galileo by Bertolt Brecht: A Critical Analysis

Undoubtedly Brecht altered his view of Galileo and the historical importance of his scientific discoveries under the influence of the atomic bomb which was dropped on Hiroshima during the creation of Galileo. Brecht could not ignore the fact the atomic bomb with its fateful possibilities was a product of the science founded by Galileo at the beginning of the scientific age.

Galileo interests Brecht not as a character but as a case.

The arrangement and execution of the play permit us to interpret Galileo's behaviour in recanting under pressure from the Inquisition as the manifestation of a rational cunning, which accommodate itself to the powerful only formally and seemingly, in order to be able to undermine their authority more effectively. For the fact that Galileo does not fear death under all circumstances indeed is ready to face it if the execution of his experiment requires it, is proved by his attitude during the plague: he passionately continues his experiments despite constant mortal danger. He had proved repeatedly that he only judged the forces and powers of the world functionally, insofar as they were advantageous or detrimental to his researches. Decisive however is the way in which Brecht has Galileo maintains a hedonistic view of life and binds obsessive joy in experimentation and discovery.

Teaching a new science in a new way, he practices a new human attitude in a world which turns out to be both needful and capable of change.

From Brecht's humane, even radically anthropological position, the question of a new age is identical with the possibility of developing a new type of human existence and establishing it in the face of the resistant tradition.

Galileo cannot fulfill the historical heroic role in which his pupils would like to see him because he is unable to transcend, and hopelessly falls victim to, the law of human frailty.
