

Chinua Achebe's Things Fall Apart, the Lucid One, and Crisis of Authority

Professor A.N. Akwanya

Abstract

Things Fall Apart has the air of concrete facticity, and therefore has usually been taken to be a realist work, with complete coincidence of sense and meaning. Leveraging on the fact that fiction normally deploys a narrative eye, which then works like a spotlight, it is made out in this paper that as a light-bearer, literally, the principal character of a tale inevitably sets off patterns of association and resemblance to other literary light-bearers and the sequences and patterns of denouement conventionally associated with them. While it is usual practice to see Okonkwo and Things Fall Apart as rooted in a unique and stable social system, the horizontal plane which connects to personages seen in literature of other places and times should not be ignored. This paper will build on the latter viewpoint. Thus it is possible to see Okonkwo as typical – which means that he is more than what is seen at the textual level. He is a 'dreamer' and also an 'intoxicated one', and being a very important member of Umuofia, these personal traits are working out their logic – and destabilizing impact – within the heart of Umuofia, down to its foundations. The white man will enter Umuofia in the midst of all this and catalyze the process into a premature denouement. The 'dreamer' and the 'intoxicated one', however, are mythical images frequently encountered in high mimetic literature.

Introduction

The crisis that shakes up the 'static Umuofia culture' in Things Fall Apart (Dan Izevbaye 3), probably comes down to what remains, if any, of 'traditional society' following the disastrous killing of the court messenger by Okonkwo and his own suicide. This beyond bears thinking, although the text closes without throwing back the door that might lead to it. T. Obinkaram Echewa's The Land's Lord may of course be considered to have already exercised that thinking, where at the end of the tussle between Father Higler the missionary and Ahamba the leader of the local resistance, the latter is the one left standing and in the commanding position. But there is another
