

purpose and is not redeemed, in the pageant sections, by its general fidelity to historical truth. Could it therefore have served some other purpose as a pieza de circunstancias? Professor Reichenberger, doubtless wisely, does not speculate, but a reviewer can be rash. The MS is signed and dated in Toledo, 20 November 1604. Three months earlier Peace with England had been signed in London. The play glorifies an alliance between Spain and another Catholic power with the blessing of the Pope (see, especially, lines 2778-90). Could it have been intended as an implicit contrast, thus indicating disapproval of peace with a Protestant power? There are the further facts that a play entitled Carlos Quinto was performed by Antonio de Prado in the Royal Palace on 28 May 1623; that on the following day Prado announced that he was ordered to stop the performance of the same play in the Corral de la Cruz; that owing to the public disturbance thereby caused the play was put on next day without admission charge; and that at this time the Prince of Wales was in Madrid for the Anglo-Spanish marriage, having made his public entry into the city ten weeks previously. Is it merely a coincidence that these two important dates of 1604 and 1623 link this play with England? Professor Reichenberger in recording the 1623 performances points out that we cannot be sure that this was the play in question, since the notices refer to a Primera and a Segunda Parte and there is no reference in the text to a continuation. However, if there had been one now lost, the double play might have had a more satisfactory dramatic pattern than has its first half alone. If a Second Part had followed Charles from Ghent into Germany to show him dealing firmly with religious rebels, the topicality of the theme in 1604 and 1623 would have been enhanced.

Without some such connexion with current affairs it is difficult to explain not only how such a dramatically unsatisfactory play came to be written, but also why it proved so popular, for the licences for performance written on this MS point to a successful and prolonged run throughout the country: Valladolid 1607, Madrid and Zaragoza 1608, Lisbon 1609, Jaén and Málaga 1610, Murcia 1611, Granada 1615, Lisbon 1617, and back to Madrid in 1620. Perhaps the appeal of its pageantry does explain everything, but one hopes for Lope's sake that there was some other reason.
