

1. Every game round begins with the strategic phase, during which players take actions represented with the following tokens in a certain order:
 - Rallying of fighters in rout
 - Reconstitution of the activation order of the fighters in play
 - Tactical roll

RALLYING THE FIGHTERS IN ROUT

It can happen that certain fighters, having been frightened by especially terrifying opponents, suffer the effects of rout. This effect is, however, not irreversible, and the fighters in rout have a chance of getting a hold of themselves at the beginning of each round.

The rolls on rallying are described in the section on the rally order of this book (p. 34).

ACTIVATION SEQUENCE

During a game of Conquest, each fighter is represented by his reference card. A single card can also represent several fighters with the same profile.

At the beginning of the strategic phase each player makes a job with all his reference cards by placing them in the order that he wishes. This job is called the activation sequence. During the activation phase the cards are drawn out by one at the order that is defined in this way. Certain game effects are able to modify this sequence.

During the game, if all fighters represented by the same reference card are eliminated, then this card should no longer be included in the activation sequence.

TACTICAL ROLL

Once each player has defined his activation sequence, they proceed with a Discipline test: the Tactical roll. For this roll at the die, each player must select a fighter of his choice. This fighter is considered to be coordinating the army, and the Tactical roll is therefore made using his DEX. This value can be modified by certain bonuses or penalties (for possession of a musician, a spell's effects, etc.), but in no way can a fighter use a commander's DEX instead of his own for the Tactical roll.

The consequences of this test are felt all along the game round being played, so it is important to keep in mind which of the two players won it.
