Optimal Cube-connected Cube Multiprocessors Xian-He Sun, Institute for Computer Applications in Science and Engineering, 1993 Abstract Many CFD computational fluid dynamics and other scientific applications can be partitioned into subproblems However in general the partitioned subproblems are very large They demand high performance computing power themselves and the solutions of the subproblems have to be combined at each time step In this paper the cube connect cube CCCube architecture is studied The CCCube architecture is an extended hypercube structure with each node represented as a cube It requires fewer physical links between nodes than the hypercube and provides the same communication support as the hypercube does on many applications The reduced physical links can be used to enhance the bandwidth of the remanding links and therefore enhance the overall performance The concept and the method to obtain optimal CCCubes which are the CCCubes with a minimum number of links under a given total number of nodes are proposed The superiority of optimal CCCubes over standard hypercubes has also been shown in terms of the link usage in the embedding of a binomial tree A useful computation structure based on a semi binomial tree for divide and conquer type of parallel algorithms has been identified We have shown that this structure can be implemented in optimal CCCubes without performance degradation compared with regular hypercubes The result presented in this paper should provide a useful approach to design of scientific parallel computers
