industrial Detroit a frequently publicized narrative suggests that artists are the solution to repairing the city's image of abandonment, violence and chronic fiscal failure. This thesis does not aim to endorse nor repudiate this assertion but rather aspires to illustrate recent artistic activity alongside realistic economic and social realities facing the city of Detroit. Detroit is not a blank canvas; prescriptive cultural development cannot mask the struggles of a city and its residents. Arguably, however, there are opportunities for economic development by way of arts and culture. To better understand how exactly these opportunities are manifested, this thesis begins with a history of the city recounting points of industrial success and decline, racial tensions and plans for overcoming current civic challenges. Next, critically examining creative economy theories put forth by urban scholars such as Charles Landry, Richard Florida and John Howkins provides a worthwhile perspective on how creativity can revive and grow cities. This discourse and subsequent debate sets the stage for conversations on creative placemaking in which the physical and social character of neighborhoods, towns and cities are shaped by arts and culture. Looking at arts activity in Detroit defined within these dualistically aesthetic and social parameters helps to pinpoint how exactly the arts are improving the quality of life for Detroiters. By surveying the artistic ecosystem in the city of Detroit, the goal is to substantiate the beneficial role of the arts in urban revitalization. Though arts-based activity is demonstrably fueling growth in Detroit, like anything, it is only part of the solution to a larger economic and social recovery. Thus, throughout this thesis, arts and culture are investigated as part of a larger network of funding sources, economic development organizations, businesses, political leaders, community organizers and other urban enthusiasts. Understanding these networks will help to identify how individual artists and organizations are acting entrepreneurially despite an overall deficiency of resources to contribute to the revival of Detroit, a city defined as a case study in Rust Belt decline.

The Sustaining Hand Bryan D. Jones, Lynn W. Bachelor, 1993. This book seeks to uncover the linkages between business leaders motivated by profit and political decision makers motivated by electoral gain by examining the responses of public officials in three Michigan auto cities: Detroit, Flint and Pontiac to plant location choices made by General Motors and Chrysler. Throughout, the authors focus on three issues: the relationship between the local industrial economy and the local political system; the structure of urban politics; and the degree of independence of political decision makers in urban affairs. *Dixon Road Group v.
