Does the concept of self acceptance help coaches to develop their clients? Jackie Curran, 2018-11-13 Essay from the year 2015 in the subject Psychology Consulting and Therapy grade 70 University of Cumbria course Psychology with Counselling language English abstract Psychological coaching is a field which is not dissimilar to teaching with both occurring in an educational context of some sort teaching is perhaps a more formalised field of education whereas coaching is more informal In both contexts the desired change could be seen to be equitable to development in teaching the student increases their intelligence and presumably their educational attainment Conversely in psychological coaching the change tends to be on a more psychological level where the client alters some aspect of their thinking or cognition in order to cope better with events which are happening in their life whether it be at work or possibly in their private lives which can potentially result in the client experiencing a greater quality of life The stereotypical view of psychological coaching or any sort of psychological work including counselling may be that it entails a one sided dialogue from the client to the coach psychologist informing them of their problems in great depth whilst the psychologist takes notes and probes the client further about their thoughts and responses However this perception of coaching implies that the problem is simply being examined and analysed without any actions being taken to change matters which is arguably anathema to the core essentials of coaching Cavanagh and Grant 2014 note that all types of coaching whichever domain they may fall into are solution based to some extent of which perhaps the most notable and relevant to this assignment is Cognitive Behavioural coaching CBC A close relative of Cognitive Behavioural Therapy its core principles are aligned with self acceptance getting clients to be less harsh and critical of themselves coachees can be notoriously self critical and have overt perfectionist tendencies and set more realistic goals which they can strive towards and have a more realistic chance of achieving Williams et al 2014 Theoretically CBC and the self acceptance principles it espouses could be extremely effective although it could be deemed to be overly pluralistic and homogenous in nature as in its theoretical incarnation at least it seems to show blatant disregard for some of the potential obstacles to CBC actually resulting in positive change
