Lakshmi Narasaiah,2006 Many people still think first of economic growth in relation to poverty reduction Indeed their correlation is one of the mostdiscussed issues of combating poverty The relationship is of great importance because if there is a clear causal dependency reducing poverty could fundamentally be limited to measures to promote growth However if there was low growth or stagnation it would not be possible to reduce poverty decisively In the opposite case that of the phenomena having no causal relation promising measures to reduce poverty could be taken up even without economic growth Hardly anyone now explicitly expresses the view that economic development trickles down automatically to the poor Practical experience has refuted this assumption dating from the early days of development policy in the 1960s However a number of studies show development of growth and a decline in poverty running parallel On the other hand there are also examples which show that despite high economic growth poverty is not reduced markedly The common answer to the question this raises is thus Yes growth can reduce poverty but only if additional measures oriented on the poor are taken up This is often termed pro poor growth But what that means in detail and whether economic growth as such plays a causal role at all is not clarified It is worth taking a look at the arguments on the basis of more recent empirical and theoretical knowledge Among the many indicators of poverty the income of the poor income poverty has the closest relationship to economic growth An increase in gross domestic product and thus national income could if other factors come into play be
