

DEVELOPMENT AS PROCESS

How can the complexity and unpredictability of planned development be understood?

How can project managers deal with the social relationships and institutional contexts in which they operate?

Linking practical experience and contemporary social theory, this book offers alternative ways of thinking about 'development as process' and new methods for field research and programme monitoring. Conventionally, the complexity of development work has been 'managed' through the use of simple project models in which planned inputs lead logically to predictable outputs. In focusing on the unintended outcome, the unmanageable element, the local variability of effects, and the importance of social relationships, the contributors in this book challenge simplistic managerial models and suggest new approaches and methods which acknowledge, explore and positively engage with the unexpected and with diversity in the development process.

Drawing on work in agriculture, irrigation, forestry, and fisheries in countries in Asia and the former Soviet Union, Development as Process examines changing information needs faced by development agencies as they shift from simple technology-led project approaches, towards an emphasis on policy change, institutional reform and inter-agency partnerships. In looking critically at the politics of information production and use in different cultural and institutional settings, Development as Process goes beyond method and technique and proposes a new look at the role of monitoring information in planned development.
