ABSTRACT

Presurgical Orthopaedics is any treatment that alters the position of the segments of cleft maxilla in infancy prior to lip and palate reconstruction. There are different approaches, with different mechanics, seeking and achieving different end results. This article describes PNAS, a current approach to the traditional method of presurgical infant orthopaedics for patients with unilateral and bilateral clefts of lip and palate. The goal of PNAS is to align and approximate the alveolar cleft segments while at the same time achieving correction of nasal cartilage and soft tissue deformity. Key words : Cleft palate; Cleft lip; Presurgical orthopaedics; Presurgical nasopalveolar molding (PNAM)

Cleft lip and palate are the commonest congenital malformations with incidence ranging from 1 in 750 to 1 in 1000 live births.¹ Although cleft lip and palate are distinct and separate congenital abnormalities, they often occur concomitantly.² These deformities occur when mesenchymal connective tissues from different embryologic structures fail to meet and merge with each other. Cleft lip is the result of failure of fusion of medial nasal process with maxillary process. It may be unilateral or bilateral and may extend into alveolar process. Cleft palate on the other hand, is the result of either the lateral palatine shelves to fuse with each other, or its fusion with the nasal septum or with primary palate. A complete cleft lip and palate is a severe malformation which contributes to multiple functional deficiencies with direct influence on mastication, hearing, speech, facial growth, feeding and breathing. This aberrant growth pattern also presents with a great deal of personal, social and psychological morbidity.

Genetic and environmental factors are implicated, although exact etiology of cleft lip and palate is not known. The cleft is apparent by the third month of fetal development. It is during the remaining period of growth and development, which extends until adolescence, that the cleft exerts a secondary effect upon the whole of the middle third of the face and leads to the classical deformities.

In addition to the altered appearance and function resulting from the cleft (primary defect) and the secondary adaptations of otherwise normal structures, there is the added influence of treatment. Whether the influence is favorable or unfavorable to the pattern of facial growth is dependent on the clinician's knowledge as well as technical ability in designing and carrying out a treatment plan.

Those responsible for cleft palate habilitation should ensure that the young patients are receiving treatment that will secure the bone development, tooth position, and soft tissue support to allow the use of conservative prosthetic replacements.

PRESURGICAL ORTHOPAEDICS

This concept was introduced at University of Glasgow by Kerr McNeil in 1954 as an adjunctive neonatal therapy aiming at nonsurgical reduction of the size of the alveolar cleft.³ The rationale behind "Maxillary Orthopedics" as described by McNeil, Burston and Rosenstein is that early segment alignment will allow the maxillary halves to develop normally even though a normal bony union is not present.

The primary purpose of the appliance prior to lip closure is not to proliferate tissue or initiate growth but to guide the maxillary segments into proper spatial position with each other and with the mandibular arch. After the maxillary appliance has the segments in good alignment, the plastic surgeon restores lip continuity. The molding pressure of the surgically closed cleft lip, along with the appliance helps to create an ideal arch form.
