

CHINA AND THE NEW CLIMATE ECONOMY

The New Climate Economy Report

CHINA CASE STUDY – EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

The ultimate goals of economic growth are to expand human freedom and provide a better, safer and cleaner Earth for both present and future generations. The global economy has the potential to continue to grow 30% in the next 25 years. But the risk of environmental damage and climate change limits a shared view of prospects for long-term growth. In the next 25 years, China has the potential to become the world's largest economy. As a result, more than any other country, it faces huge opportunities and challenges.

Economy

After 30 years of rapid economic growth, China's growth rate has been slowing down. China's GDP growth rate fell to around 7.7% in 2013, the lowest since the 1992 Asian financial crisis.

Capital and fixed asset investment have driven growth over the past 30 years. However, because of a decrease in the return of investment (ROI), such investment-driven economic growth will not be sustainable. Meanwhile, financial constraints and slow long-term to negatively impact economic growth. If these are not dealt with effectively, Chinese growth may stall and China will risk falling into the so-called "middle-income trap" and becoming a high-income country.

The biological innovation and improvements in resource productivity will therefore be critical for China's economic growth prospects. Analysis for the report suggests that China's economy could fall from 7% growth in the coming years, before falling to 5% by 2025.

Energy

China is in the final stages of industrialization and is in the process of urbanization. In recent years, China has undertaken huge efforts to increase energy productivity through increasing energy efficiency and developing renewable energy. However, due to rapid economic growth, China remains highly dependent on fossil fuels. While China is now the world's largest renewable energy producer, it is also the world's largest importer of fossil fuels.

Even taking into account current energy conservation policies, primary energy demand in China will exceed the capacity of energy supply. Dependence on foreign supply is also expected to reach 70% for oil and over 40% for natural gas by 2020, and carbon emissions from coal are expected to exceed the self-environmental capacity. Compared to developed economies, China's economy is more exposed to price volatility in the global energy market due to its fossil fuel dominated energy structure and high proportion of secondary industry. Sectors of the economy with high exposure to price risk account for about 20% of GDP, several times higher than that in the developed economies.
