

IMMUNOCHEMICAL TECHNIQUES

Immunochemistry is an advanced area of immunology. It deals with the chemical components and chemistry (chemical reactions) of immunological phenomena, that is of antibody and antigen. Immunochemical methods are processes utilizing the highly specific affinity of an antibody for its antigen. It detects the distribution of a given protein or antigen in tissues or cells. The methods used for the immunochemical analysis are called immunochemical techniques; they are highly important in diagnostic and clinical context, as now even normal cell with many proteins are altered in diseased state (in cancer).

CHARACTERISTICS AND ROLE:

CHARACTERISTICS

- Simple, rapid and robust
- Highly sensitive
- Easily automated – applicable to regular clinical diagnostic laboratories
- Does not require extensive and easily destructible sample preparation
- Do not require expensive instrumentation
- Mostly based on simple photo-, fluoro- and luminometric detection
- Measurements may be either qualitative or quantitative.

ROLES

The characteristic features of these techniques are helpful for the following:

- Function of newly identified or novel proteins can be identified
- Importance of uncharacterized protein in their natural environment can be analyzed
- Determination of species or tissues in which the protein or residues is expressed
- The cell type or sub-cellular compartment in which the protein can be found
- Detect whether there is any variation in expression of protein during development of the organism
- Some alteration in the normal expression pattern of a particular protein may indicate a particular disease state; Gives information that may be useful for diagnosis and treatment
