

tion, games, testing, room arrangement, and evaluation are only some of the training program areas that are dealt with thoroughly.

This is an excellent reference book for the inservice instructor in any area, especially the "teacher" who is setting up a new program.

Orientation and Evaluation of the Professional Nurse.

Hilliard, Mildred. C V Mosby Co, 3301 Washington Blvd, St Louis, Mo 63103, 1974, 166 pp, $5.95.

The change from a costly orientation program that failed to provide job satisfaction to one based on a philosophy of self-directed learning is explained by the author.

The reader is asked to accept the premises that new graduates have completed an educational program preparing them to give nursing care to hospitalized patients; that use of self-directed learning techniques and independent study is well established; and, given the proper tools as a guide and assistance when help is needed, the graduate nurse can start practice and make significant contributions to the patient care team.

The book provides information specific to the practice of nursing and gives examples of procedures for self-directed learning. It contains much information that would be helpful for nurses writing procedures, determining criteria for staffing, and assigning patient care.

For the nurse who likes to learn about new ways of doing things, chapters one, two, and four explain reasons for introducing the change, how it was done, and the results obtained.

Management of Surgical Complications.

3rd ed. Artz, Curtis P, Hardy, James D, eds. W B Saunders Co, W Washington Sq, Philadelphia, Pa 19105, 1975, 834 pp, $30.

This third edition follows seven years after the second edition and, as stated by the editors, is again aimed at acquainting general surgeons with the complications they are most likely to encounter both at the operating room table and during the critical postoperative period. The policy of rotating authorship of various chapters has been continued so that over half of the 42 authors are new.

As with most basic works, the revisions have resulted in deleting some topics and adding others. Former chapters on complications of radiation therapy, pediatric surgery, and urological surgery have been incorporated under topics such as head and neck, breast carcinoma, anesthesia, burns, hernia repair, and transplantations and gastrointestinal surgery in infants. Chapters on neurological complications after surgery and complications of transplantation and following surgery of women with potentially curable breast carcinoma reflect a growing concern for refinement of the art. This synthesis has resulted in six less chapters and ten fewer authors.

This book should be in every operating room library as a reference for the surgical and nursing staffs.

Clinical Interviewing and Counseling: Principles and Techniques.

Edinburg, Golda M, Zinberg, Norman E, Kelman, Wendy. Appleton-Century-Crofts, 440 Park Ave S, New York, NY 10016, 1975, 126 pp.

Judgment, sensitivity, and intelligence are qualities the professional person uses in clinical interviews and counseling. Operating room nurses, too, are looking for ways to improve these qualities to improve patient care.

Although this book is written to give beginning social workers the "how to" of the interview process, the language is understandable to the nonclinical social worker as well. Because of the readable style and examples with each step of the interview, the mystery of how a client discovers "how he as an individual works" is clearly revealed.

There are many times that OR nurses wish
