

Controversies in contraception for women with epilepsy

Abstract

Contraception is an important choice that offers autonomy to women with regard to prevention of unintended pregnancies. There is wide variation in the contraceptive practices between continents, countries, and societies. The medical eligibility for contraception for sexually active women with epilepsy (WWE) is determined by the type of anti-epileptic drugs (AEDs) that they use. Enzyme inducing AEDs such as phenobarbitone, phenytoin, carbamazepine, and oxcarbazepine increase the metabolism of orally administered estrogen (and progesterone to a lesser extent). Estrogen can increase the metabolism of certain AEDs, such as lamotrigine, leading to cyclical variation in its blood level with resultant adverse effect profile or seizure dyscontrol. AEDs and sex hormones can increase the risk of osteoporosis and fracture in WWE. The potential interactions between AEDs and hormonal contraception need to be discussed with all women in reproductive age-group. The alternate options of oral contraception such as intrauterine copper device, intrauterine levonorgestrel release system, and supplementary protection with barriers need to be presented to them. World Health Organization has recommended to avoid combination contraceptive pills containing estrogen and progesterone in women who desire contraception and in breastfeeding mothers. Care providers need to consider the option of non-enzyme-inducing AEDs while initiating long-term treatment in adolescent and young WWE.

Introduction

There are about 50 million people with epilepsy across the world. Men and women are affected almost in equal numbers in most continents. About half of the women with epilepsy are in the reproductive age-group of 15-49 years. Contraception offers considerable benefits to women. It enhances the autonomy of the women with regard to their health and personal life. It can promote their health by reducing the risk of adolescent pregnancy, recurrent pregnancies without adequate spacing, and risk of unintended pregnancies or unhealthy abortion practices. Studies have shown that contraceptive practices lead to reduced infant mortality. Barrier contraceptives offer the additional protection against human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) and sexually transmitted infections.

Most women with epilepsy (WWE) need to continue on anti-epileptic drugs (AEDs) in order to remain seizure-free during the 30-35 years of sexually active period. In the absence of effective contraceptive methods, there is increased risk of unplanned pregnancies and considerable emotional stress.^[1] The contraceptive needs of a client with epilepsy are often ignored and not discussed across with a clinician. Women may be embarrassed to discuss this in crowded practices and busy clinicians may overlook this important area. It is common experience that partners find unexpected and unplanned pregnancies pregnancy.

Controversies Regarding Contraception in WWE

There is much controversy regarding the choice of contraceptive method for WWE: Whether it should be hormonal contraception or other methods such as intrauterine devices, or barrier methods. Another important concern is the efficacy of hormonal contraception, when used along with AEDs. Other controversies are related to the potential risk of exacerbation of epilepsy or predisposition for osteoporosis when women use hormonal contraceptives. The objective of this review is to highlight the pharmacokinetic basis of the controversies regarding the contraceptive options of WWE and discuss the recommendations of the World Health contraceptive needs of today's medically challenging patients with HIV/AIDS, uterine fibroids, or cardiac, neurologic, or thyroid disease. The book gives attention to recommendations on the use of contraception in women with medical problems such as diabetes, obesity, epilepsy, and lupus, among others, and provides comprehensive information regarding the effects that certain drugs may have on contraceptive hormone levels. While national guidelines do exist for contraceptive eligibility, this book discusses in more detail the evidence behind the guideline recommendations and the nuances that clinicians confront in daily practice.
