Migration From Food-Contact Materials

A recently published progress report by the U.K. Working Party on Chemical Contaminants from Food-Contact Materials* details a major programme on paper and board. The programme included the analysis of 33 samples, which proved to contain 11 volatile substances at concentrations above 1 mg/kg. One of these was the carcinogen Michler's ketone, found in unbleached paper used for dry goods and paper bags. Cadmium, chromium and lead were found in some paper and board samples, but the levels were not of toxicological concern even if total extraction was assumed.

A detailed study of the migration of mineral hydrocarbons into food revealed levels of up to 100 mg/kg in individual portion packs of UHT milk, cream and butter, 105 mg/kg in skinless sausages, 550 mg/kg in wrapped bread, biscuits and breakfast cereals, 1300 mg/kg in confectionary products wrapped in waxed paper, and 1700 mg/kg in sandwiches and microwave-reheated foods encased in waxed paper bags. No mineral hydrocarbons could be detected in dairy products wrapped in polystyrene, acrylonitrile-butadiene-styrene or waxed board, beverages in polystyrene containers, or food simulants in contact with printed polypropylene and aluminium foil.

Studies on polymeric plasticizers showed that poly (isobutylene) migrated from polyethylene cling film into microwaved soup, baby food and macaroni cheese, and into sandwiches refrigerated overnight and then left at room temperature for 5 hr. Poly (butylene adipate) also migrated into foods under conditions of simulated home use, the lowest molecular weight fraction being most mobile. Neither poly (butylene adipate) nor poly (propylene adipate) was hydrolysed to monomers after 4 hr at 37°C in simulated gastric fluid, and only the latter showed some minor evidence of hydrolysis after the same treatment with simulated intestinal fluid.

Benzene in thermoset polyester cookware was found to result from tert-butyl perbenzoate used as a catalyst, and UK manufacturers obviated the problem by switching to alternative catalysts. Benzene was also identified in polystyrene packaging and non-stick cookware, but no migration could be detected into food cooked in the latter items, or on microwave susceptors. Further studies on benzene levels in a range of different food-contact materials, and on its migration into food, are now in progress.

Analysis of dual-ovenable cookware made of thermoset polyester revealed a large variety of potential migrants, of which three-ethylbenzene, benzaldehyde and styrene – were studied in detail. All three migrated into olive oil at 175°C, and styrene was also detected at concentrations in the range 1 to 2 mg/kg in pork belly after cooking for 1 hr at the same temperature. Several migrants, including antioxidants, were found in the aqueous extracts from plastic flasks and kettles, and these are being further examined. Preliminary studies have also been conducted on the transformation products of some major antioxidants during plastics processing, and work to identify such products is continuing.
