Communication and Culture: Readings in the Codes of Human Interaction, Alfred G. Smith, Ed. New York: Rinehart and Winston, Inc., 1966, pp. xi, 626, price $ 7.50.

Reviewed by
JACOB A. LOEWEN

In the preface of this volume of selected readings Smith aptly defines the human communications event as a "subtle, ingenious, varied and ever present set of processes." Wherever people interact, they communicate; and no matter how simple the message, their communication involves a complexity of signals, codes, meanings and media.

Communication has been the focus of interest for at least three scientific disciplines: mathematics, social psychology and linguistic anthropology. The mathematicians are primarily concerned with communication models and with the mechanics of message transmission. They have little interest in the actual meaning of the message. Social psychologists and linguists, while interested in models and transmission, usually focus their attention on the content of the message and its effect on the receptors.

Smith divides the process of communication into three major dimensions: (1) syntactics—the relationship between signs (or symbols) carrying the message; (2) semantics—the relationship of signs to things and events; and (3) pragmatics—the relationship of signs to human behavior.

In an attempt to provide a comprehensive framework for the theory and practice of communication, Smith combines the three scientific disciplines and the three dimensions listed above into a nine-category matrix. To fill this matrix, he has selected fifty-five published essays produced by more than seventy-five cooperating authors. (These essays represent the cream of recent writings on communication and have been brought together from many books and professional journals, most of which are usually unavailable to the missionary on the field.) To achieve overall unity (within such diversity) the essays have been edited to eliminate irrelevant and redundant parts.

Each essay included in the book was selected on the basis of the following criteria: (1) Does it contribute substantially to the overall purpose of the book? (2) Was it written after Claude E. Shannon and Warren Weaver's The Mathematical Theory of Communication, and Norbert Wiener's Cybernetics? (3) Is it amenable to integration into its respective section and will it provide the basis for the selection following it? (4) Is the essay based on empirical tests? (5) Will it meet the test of classroom use, i e., will it be readily understandable to non-specialists in the discipline from which it is drawn?
