

Mental Retardation and Learning Disabilities: Conceptual and Applied Issues

Edward A. Falloway, James R. Patton, Tom E. C. Smith, and Glenn H. Buck

Abstract

The relationship between mental retardation and learning disabilities is clouded by conceptual issues and current practices in applied (e.g., educational and noneducational) settings. In this article, we initially discuss whether mental retardation can be considered a concomitant disability associated with learning disabilities or whether these two disabilities are mutually exclusive categories. Conceptual issues related to this question are then reviewed to provide a perspective for viewing these two traditional areas of conceptionality. Emerging areas of concern in terms of definition, classification, etiology, and lifelong issues are addressed. Attention is then given to applied issues that have a direct effect on the lives of individuals with disabilities. Specific topics include educational curricula, mainstream, inclusion, and adult services and supports.

In a series of manuscripts devoted to concomitant disabilities that may be associated with learning disabilities, some categories of disabilities will quite logically warrant special attention. For example, the articles in this series that are focused on emotional and behavioral disorders, visual disabilities, hearing impairments, and physical disabilities would be ones that an individual would expect to encounter in perusing such a special series. Mental retardation (MR) and learning disabilities (LD), however, may create an instant paradox, as it did for the authors of this manuscript when they were invited to submit a paper for the series. Therefore, the issue as reflected in the initial working title for this article became a central one: Can learning disabilities and mental retardation be seen as complementary constructs that warrant attention for their possible interaction? Or, rather, are they mutually exclusive categories that by definition preclude such interaction? A critical reason for this conceptual dilemma is the fact that both disabilities have been presumed to be primarily cognitive in nature as opposed to an interaction between concomitant cognitive/behavioral deficits (e.g., LD/ED) or cognitive/sensory deficits (e.g., MR/VI). Examining the relationship between the two becomes important (a) to teachers, administrators, and psychologists who must struggle with identification and intervention practices, and (b) in light of shifting historical definitions that have determined population size.

To make sense of this inherent dilemma, this article has two primary purposes. The first is to address the conceptual issues of possible overlap that stem from considerations of definition, classification, etiology, and the lifelong nature of these respective disabilities. Specifically, our objective is not to artificially argue for the creation of another population of dually diagnosed individuals but, rather, to provide a basis for considering how these disabilities may overlap within the individual. In doing so, we posit that the only defensible position is that learning disabilities be considered a disability secondary to mental retardation. The second purpose is to consider applied issues that relate to educational and noneducational interventions. These concerns are of particular significance because it is within applied settings that decisions are made that directly affect the lives of individuals with these disabilities. Prior to discussing current conceptual and applied issues, we briefly highlight traditional views of the possible interaction or noninteraction of these two disabilities.

Traditional Views

For years there has been a clear, though somewhat artificial, conceptual distinction between MR and LD, largely based on level of measured intellectual functioning. Smith, Falloway, and Smith (1978) emphasized the problems created by this exclusion component by noting the dilemma that has resulted from the rather large group of students whose IQ scores may be above the cutoff level for mental retardation (i.e., approximately 70; Grossman, 1983) while still falling below the common base levels often used in the schools for eligibility for learning disability services (i.e., 80 to 85). Although the size of the gap would vary significantly depending on, for
