Learning to Communicate investigates the processes involved in the development of communicative skills in young children in particular as these unfold during the child's participation in social interactions in a variety of everyday educational situations. For a fuller understanding of these processes through which the child learns the vast array of communicative skills necessary to function effectively in social contexts, the broad range of situations in which the communicative exchanges are embedded—school, home, community, etc.—are examined. Comprised of 17 chapters, this volume begins by painting a vivid picture of human discrimination and prejudice that touches every child involved in the education process in the United States, a result that can be linked to language ignorance. The discussion then turns to some of the contributions of linguistics to education and some of the problems involved in reaching greater cooperation between linguists and educators. The relevance of developments in sociolinguistics to the study of language learning and early education is emphasized. Subsequent chapters focus on the communicative competence of kindergarten children, children's situational variation and situational competence, sex differences in the language of children and parents, and dialogue, monologue, and egocentric speech by children in nursery schools. This book will be of interest to teachers and students as well as to practitioners in the fields of educational psychology, psychobiology, psychiatry, linguistics, and childhood education.

What is the Matter with Communicative Competence? Reinhold Peterwagner, 2005 This book integrates recent findings of linguistic research into ELT. Its aim is to introduce future teachers to the complex concept of communicative competence, to critically analyse learners' teaching-learning deficiencies in the light of the requirements they are expected to meet at the school-leaving exams or at university entry, to offer suggestions about how to remedy these shortcomings, and also to provide teaching and testing materials.

Developing Intercultural Communicative Competence in Young Children María del Carmen Valero Sánchez, 2019 The study of a second language in an immersion setting offers learners the opportunity to communicate, to learn the insights of other cultures, and to function appropriately in those language communities. If educators want to prepare students for success in a globally interconnected world, intercultural communicative competence must form an integral part of the foreign language curriculum. Learners can experience how to appropriately use language to build relationships and understandings with members of other cultures. The increasing emphasis on the need to promote the growth of ICC in students requires educators to reexamine their own focus, philosophy, goals, curriculum, and methods. This research study investigates if implementing thematic units with embedded cultural activities in a language immersion education setting effectively develops ICC in young children. A mixed-method approach was used for collecting qualitative data through students' portfolios and quantitative data by checking the frequency of participants' attitude, knowledge, and skills exhibited during intercultural activity encounters Findings indicated that the use of cultural activities in a thematic unit increased communication in the classroom context and that the use of portfolios helped analyze students progress Abstract
