Scientific Writing and Communication in Agriculture and Natural Resources P.K.

Ramachandran Nair, Vimala D. Nair, 2014-01-03 The purpose of this book is to help early career professionals in agriculture and natural resources write their research papers for high quality journals and present their results properly at professional meetings. Different fields have different conventions for writing style such that the authors of the book have found it difficult to recommend to young scientists in these fields a specific book or source material out of the several that are available as they go to guide. Writing a scientific paper is a tedious task even to experienced writers but it is particularly so for the early career professionals such as students, trainees, scientists and scholars in agriculture and natural resources. The challenge is even more when their first language of communication is not English. This book is targeted mainly to that group. Written

Communication in an Online Learning Environment Michele Schmidt Moore, 2009 Students are entering a workforce that demands competency in writing both for explicit communication through e mail as well as in products in the company's day to day dealings. Strategies for teaching students to communicate in writing have been evaluated extensively in a face to face environment. Many of those successful strategies have been included in the development of online learning environments. However, given that the primary mode of communication in online learning contexts is in writing, online learning environments may provide an additional element that may bolster students' writing performance and communication ability. The impact of the online learning environment on writing ability has not been studied extensively. This study investigated how students' written performance and communication abilities evolved while they were learning in an online environment. Four students and three mentors participated in the study. Using a multiple case study methodology, email correspondence and assignments were evaluated to describe changes that occurred in students' communication, written products, writing process, and self efficacy as a writer. Students showed the ability to communicate about a variety of needs and problems via email correspondence. The syntax of that correspondence contained many of the conventions of text messaging at the beginning of the course and these conventions were maintained until the end of the course. Students showed better control in composing, written expression, usage, and mechanics when writing for assignments. For most students, their abilities increased in one or all of these writing domains over the duration of the course. Students' writing processes varied. The student taking an English course improved his writing process over time. For students taking the World History II course, their writing process did not evolve No students changed their perception of themselves as writers during the duration of the course
