Planning Human Resources Olivier Bertrand,Étienne Brunswic,2004 This volume presents an overview of the role of multigrade and one teacher classes in the history of primary schooling noting the factors that determine their success or failure It offers educational planners a coherent flexible and realistic set of measures for increasing provision in rural areas particularly in the French speaking countries of sub Saharan Africa Multigrade Schools Étienne Brunswic,Jean Valérien,2004 This book addresses a problem crucial to the implementation of education for all In sparsely populated or remote areas classes where a single teacher is responsible for several grades can make a big contribution and countries in Europe and North America were able to achieve universal primary education largely through multigrade schools Many countries in Latin America and Asia are achieving success with this approach which is increasing enrolment improving performance and reducing absenteeism in rural areas In India two thirds of primary schools are multigrade However while multigrade classes could be a solution for educating rural people in many African countries governments tend to focus on improving conventional schools often leaving the development of multigrade schools to local initiative For this reason multigrade schools in rural Africa tend to show poor results which in turn give them a negative image Training

Arnove,1998 Addressed to educational practitioners working at central regional or local level this booklet shows them how to conceptualize design implement monitor and evaluate literacy programs Publisher s description Reducing Repetition

Thomas Owen Eisemon,Thomas Eisemon,1997 This booklet discusses strategies for reducing repetition of grades by students at primary secondary and higher education levels Large numbers of pupils repeat their grades every year and these repetition rates are considered good indicators of an educational system's effectiveness. A high repetition rate indicates that a large number of pupils have not reached the level of learning achievement expected of them. Causes of repetition are varied and not easily detectable and probably vary from one country to another within a country from school to school and from one educational level to another. Some strategies for reducing repetition are targeted at the children and their home environment; others are more closely related to the school, the content and the teaching methods; and still others have to do with the overall policy and system. The author warns against any drastic legal type of intervention and argues in favor of combining various measures so as to arrive at a comprehensive multipronged strategy. Contains 63 references. Double-shift Schooling Mark Bray, International Institute for Educational Planning, 2008. Double shift schooling primarily aims to extend and minimise unit costs. However, some systems only achieve these goals at the expense of educational quality. Planners may be faced with difficult choices when designing systems. Drawing on experiences on a wide range of countries, this publication highlights the advantages and problems of double shift systems. Comparison is made with single shift systems and also with systems having triple even quadruple shifts. This publication will be useful to planners at sub-national levels as well as national levels; it will also be valuable to head teachers and others responsible for running double shift schools.

Effective Literacy Programmes John Oxenham, 2008. The fourth goal set by the Dakar Forum on Education for All (EFA) in 2000 aimed to achieve a 50 per cent improvement in levels of adult literacy by 2015, especially for women, and equitable access to basic and continuing education for all adults. However, the EFA Global Monitoring Report for 2006 estimated that 50 countries were at risk or serious risk of not achieving this goal. Despite a century of experience in running adult literacy programmes, the empirical comparative evidence on what makes for the most effective strategies, teaching methods and learning materials remains surprisingly scarce. This paper therefore uses what hard evidence there is to discuss the options that education and curriculum planners can consider, whether they are governmental or non-governmental. Starting from the operational meaning of literacy and the implications of a human right to literacy, this publication looks at what can realistically be expected from a literacy project and explores the different options available to education policy makers and national development planners to ensure that their own countries do achieve this literacy goal. International Schools Mary Hayden, John Jeffrey Thompson, International Institute for Educational Planning, 2008. This publication provides an insight to the origins and characteristics of international schools, curriculum and assessment, students and teaching staff, and the management, leadership and governance of these schools. It also discusses how international schools, usually private and fee-paying, might develop in the future against a backdrop of growing forces of globalization and other international influences. In all cases, attention is drawn to the implications of the issues discussed for both policy makers and planners in national and international contexts.

methodology of data collection and analysis by a management information system designed to support educational planning Proposes a set of basic quantitative indicators for the measurement of the effectiveness of an educational system

Searching for Relevance Wim H. M. L. Hoppers, 1996 Discusses work orientation programmes at the basic education level policy issues relating to work orientation in schools and the planning and implementation of work orientation programmes
