Abstract: The paper takes into account three vital categories, namely mobile society, technology, and culture. Our world gets mobile. More and more people carry out their activities on the move; it might be business, entertainment, education or just socializing. Communications become wireless and invisible, and cheaper and cheaper, the distance and location factors get increasingly irrelevant. We are quickly approaching the point beyond which we shall have good reasons to think in terms of mobile society. The purpose of this paper is to investigate certain relationships between new technologies, especially the Internet and mobile technologies, and culture. It seems that technology and culture work in opposite directions. Even a more dramatic diagnosis seems to be legitimate, viz. technology displaces culture. The major message of this discourse is that: One has to vividly oppose to the displacement of culture. The rationale is simple, viz. a decline and atrophy of culture is in many ways an extremely negative phenomenon for democratic society at large, which at the end of the day will also affect the technology itself. Towards this end, the MOST Programme (Mobile Open Society through wireless Telecommunications) was started; a short note on its objective is given in the paper.

Key words: technology, information and communications technology, culture, education, moral autonomy

1. INTRODUCTION

The paper takes into account three vital categories, namely mobile society, technology, and culture. The so called developed countries are quickly approaching the point beyond which we shall have good reasons to think of the people living there in terms of mobile society. This type of society is a result of deep transformations mainly caused by a triumphal march of information and communications technology (ICT) and an incredible development of transportation systems, in particular airlines over last sixty years. The ICT and technology as a whole have dramatically influenced almost all the facets of our life, including economy, where we are witnessing the process of establishing a new global economic order. They have also had a tremendous impact on culture and our personal living standards and habits. There are very little doubts that technology has
