- Publish best practices booklet (ISU Extension, spring 2015, <https://how.extension.iastate.edu/Product/Agricultural-Urbanism-Toolkit>) and create posters for community input sessions in communities
- 3. Map and document existing food system opportunities and gaps (including programs and built infrastructure)
 - Document topics determined through public meetings
 - Document locally verified information through steering committee meetings
- 4. Host public input sessions in communities and determine appropriate best practices for implementation
 - Evaluate best practices based on community needs/desires, access, feasibility, impact, cost, and time
- 5. Identify priority tactics for design and eventual implementation^{*}
 - Use tactic ideas to identify priority project types and locations
 - Identify projects associated short-, medium-, and long-term goals and low, medium, and high impacts
- 6. Annual event for community participants and general outreach about program

^{*} Please note that in the original grant proposal item 5 was folded into conceptual design to be completed in the first year. Based on the team's experiences, the first year now culminates with the identification of priority projects for design and implementation to occur during the second and third year of the process.

Results and discussion

While all project objectives were achieved, the Community Design Lab found that additional time was needed to build trust in communities before beginning the conceptual design of food systems projects. During the first portion of community capacity building and literature review, CDR and the lead contact in the community interviewed key stakeholders that represented best management practices in each community. This process brought new partners to the table, generated discussions around the existing best practices within the community, and bridged gaps between sectors of the food system.

Due to this finding and change in the initial process, the CDR proposed a continuation of the Agricultural Urbanism Toolkit grant for 2015-2016. This allows the original one- to two-year process to become a three-year process with more focus on coalition development during the first year.

Coalition findings: Cedar Rapids and Chicago both continued with their original coalition and moved directly into prioritized tactics by the end of Year One (see Recommendations section). Des Moines discussed adding additional steering committee members and CDR assisted by ascribing additional stakeholders and continuing meetings in the spring of 2015.
