N. Abinales,Noboru Ishikawa,Akio Tanabe,2005 As much of the world turns its attention to questions of the role and even survival of the nation state formation in an increasingly globalized world the authors of this interdisciplinary volume shift the focus of the debate by examining various sites of social action where the nation state is still in a formative stage even as it is increasingly under threat Challenges to emergent nation building arise both from within multi ethnic states as well as from without e g through pressure from international human rights organizations and the global capitalist marketplace The authors demonstrate too that this betwixt and between situation is neither entirely new nor unique to the globalized world system parallel tensions already existed between locals and migrants of regional trading networks before the European colonizers arrived on the scene to further complicate matters Including micro level ethnographies local histories and a macro theoretical overview of the world system this volume directly engages with the complexities of globalization in marginal and troubled states complexities that are themselves typically marginalized in debates all too often obsessed with the plight of the most powerful and developed nations
