This is one of those challenging papers where it's hard to know where to start. The material covered has been greatly instructive, and the topic itself is particularly captivating.

Essentially, I could say that all the authors discuss the importance and role of baptism within the reality and life of the Church. The Presbyterian authors advocate for infant "baptism" based on a specific perspective regarding the continuity between the Old and New Covenants, and the direct relationship between circumcision and baptism, both being signs and seals of God's promises to His people.

On the other hand, the Baptist authors argue that there is no full and direct continuity between the Old and New Covenants and that the relationship between circumcision and baptism is not one of direct representation but of "type and antitype," with physical circumcision being the "shadow" of what God would accomplish in the hearts of His people—namely, the "circumcision of the heart." Baptism, therefore, becomes the sign and seal of the work already accomplished in the hearts of God's people through the effective operation of His Spirit.

On these grounds, Presbyterians defend the practice of infant baptism, making infants participants in the church through faith in a potential future conversion. Baptists, however, maintain that baptism is a confirmation of a visible, past conversion.
