

Table 1: Categories of Social Construction of Gender and Sexuality (Rao Gupta, 2000)

CATEGORY	DESCRIPTION
Stereotypical	The damaging stereotypes of men are reinforced as “predator, violent, irresponsible” and women as “powerless victims or repositories of infection”.
Neutral	The target is the general population instead of either gender or sex. Despite no harm done and “better than nothing”, the different needs of women and men are ignored. Very often the basis is research that only has been tested on men, or works better for men.
Sensitive	The different needs and constraints of individuals based on their gender and sexuality are recognized and responded to. One example is to provide female condoms. Thus women’s access to protection, treatment or care can be improved, but little is done to change the old paradigm of imbalanced gender power
Transformational	The aim is to transform gender relations to make them equitable. The major focus is on the redefinition of gender roles at the personal, relationship, community and societal levels.
Empowering	The central idea is to “seek to empower women or free women and men from the impact of destructive gender and sexual norms”. Women are encouraged to take necessary actions at personal as well as community levels to participate in decision-making. One misunderstanding that needs to be corrected is that empowering women isn’t equal to disempowering men. The fact is more power to women would eventually lead to more power to both, since empowering women improves households, communities and entire nations.
