While speaking he had closed the door behind him and had stepped into the quarters occupied jointly by himself and by Midshipman Daniel Dalzell also of the first or upper class. Danny boy isn't here. Visiting probably mused Dave Darrin after having glanced into the alcove bedroom at his right hand. It was a Saturday night early in October. The new academic year at the Naval Academy was but a week old. There being no hop that night the members of the brigade had their time to spend as they pleased. Some of the young men would need the time sadly to put in at their new studies. Dave fortunately did not feel under any necessity to spend his leisure in grinding over text books. Dave glanced at his study desk though he barely saw the pile of text books neatly piled up there. No letters to write tonight he thought. I was going to loan Danny boy one of my two new novels. No matter if he'd rather visit let him do so. In the short interval of recreation that had followed the evening meal Dave had missed his home chum and roommate but had thought nothing of it. Nor was Dave now really disappointed over the present prospect of having an hour or two by himself. He went to a one shelf book rack high overhead and pulled down one of his two recent novels. Dave Darrin's Fourth Year at Annapolis H.
