Database Concept

A database is a collection of logically related information/data, which is available for one or more users organised in a way, so that it can be easily accessed, managed and updated. It is actually a place, where related piece of information is stored and various operations can be performed on it by the user.

A database is basically a computer based record/data/information keeping system. Data is raw, unorganised facts and entities relevant to the user need to be processed such as a digital representation of text, numbers, graphical images or sound. The data are stored in such a way that, they are independent of the programs used by the people for accessing the data.

e.g. Consider the names, telephone numbers and addresses of the relatives, etc. You may have recorded this data in an indexed address book or you may have stored it on a hard drive, using application software such as Microsoft Access, OpenOffice.org BASE etc.

Database can be created with the help of following structures

Need for a Database

The need for a database arose in the early 1960s in response to the traditional file processing system. In the file processing system, the data is stored in the form of files and a number of application programs are written by programmers to add, modify, delete and retrieve data to and from appropriate files.

However, the file processing system has a number of problems, which are as follows

- Some information may be duplicate in several files.
- The file processing system lacks the insulation between program and data.
- Handling new queries is difficult, since it requires change in the existing application programs or requires a new application program.
- Unable to maintain data standards and does not provide data sharing.
- In this system, all the integrity rules need to be explicitly programmed in all application programs, which are using that particular data item.
- This system also lacks security features.
