Abstract

University researchers conduct large numbers of case studies in the field of consumer studies each year and many are published in the research journals. Although illuminative and rich in description, qualitative data collected in case studies are singular and often lack generalizability. There is a need for comprehensive studies that subsume individual case studies related to consumer sciences in nutrition, apparel and clothing, consumer consumption, housing, and family studies.

The purpose of this paper was to present a step-by-step methodological procedure for a qualitative meta-analysis, using components of Straus and Corbin's grounded theory data coding technique. This research provides a systematic and rigorous research procedure for deriving hypothetical statements from multiple case studies in the consumer studies discipline as well as other academic disciplines. This method offers a way to overcome the limitation of individual, data-burdensome case studies bounded by context. It extracts conceptual trends across individual case study and eliminates these contextual boundaries. It fills a void in research techniques, by combining existing qualitative case study methods, grounded theory coding techniques, and meta-analysis to create generalizable hypotheses, grounded in the data. This methodology can provide testable hypotheses which contribute to the larger picture of an overall theory in consumer studies or another academic field.

Introduction

Vast numbers of case studies exist in consumer studies research. The increasing contributions of qualitative researchers to the field have been both a blessing and a curse to practitioners. Library databases, such as ABI/INFORM Global, EBSCOhost, or ProQuest Dissertations and Theses offer access to hundreds of singular case studies related to consumer sciences in nutrition, textiles and clothing, consumer consumption, family studies, and related fields. They are abundant in the literature possibly because researchers' time is channelled into developing and recording practical curricula for their own universities. Case studies may be termed 'illuminative evaluations' (Morgan, 1991, p. 6) and consist of examining particular incidences or events and the complex meaning associated with those events. Some researchers believe that case studies have limited generalizability to the larger body of knowledge in consumer studies and efforts should be made to contribute to the theoretical knowledge base of formal concepts. Concern also exists over the possible lack of methodological rigour and reliability, the absence of comparative analysis, and the lack of a cumulative nature; that is, case studies may not relate to or extend earlier work (Morgan, 1991; Ogawa and Mañen, 1991; Atkinson and Delamont, 1993).

In spite of these potential shortcomings, qualitative case studies provide numerous concepts practitioners can adapt to their own settings and they generate rich descriptions of a particular context. However, the sheer number of case studies requires excessive time to sort and examine. In 1970, Glass used a mining metaphor to describe the vast quantities of unrelated research. The mines of science have mountains of accumulated, unrefined ore. Many of the raw findings get buried under new accumulations, even though science would be better served if the findings were refined and hammered into usable metal (Glass, 1970). Four decades later, the need is greater than ever. Individual qualitative case studies are singular in nature and there is a need for comprehensive studies that subsume individual studies. Research has progressed to the point that there is a need for identifying the 'cement that glues' these unique case studies (DeWitt-Brink and Rhodes, 1992, p. 5).

The purpose of this study was to develop and use a scientific methodological procedure for a meta-analysis of qualitative case studies that contributes to theory development. This research method has merit for the readers of International Journal of
