ABSTRACT

German governments throughout the last 25 years have accepted the sustainability paradigm and put forth an energy policy that supports the development of renewable energies, the reduction of greenhouse gas emissions and the improvement of energy efficiency. Together with the process of seeking to phase out nuclear power, these objectives constitute the ‘Energiewende’ (energy transition); the Energiewende has reached a level that reveals its challenges and thus makes it a valuable case study. Based on a multi-method stakeholder analysis, frequently debated controversial issues related to the Energiewende have been identified and will be confronted with “reality” in this paper. The set of controversial issues includes the following five aspects: security of electricity supply, rising electricity prices for industry and commerce, rising electricity prices for consumers, impacts of the energy transition on employment, and the effects of the politically instigated speed of the Energiewende on its practical implementation.

1. Introduction

In Germany, the federal governments of the last twenty years, whether led by the conservative Christian Democrats or the Social Democrats, have specified their ideas on a sustainable development of the country and the related energy system. The transformation of the energy system constitutes the core of a comprehensive strategy to redirect Germany onto a future-oriented and sustainable path [1,2]. Beyond the transformation of the energy system, this comprehensive strategy encompasses and operationalizes further social, economic and environmental objectives of sustainable development [3]. In this paper, however, neither the concept of sustainable development nor the comprehensive sustainability strategy itself shall be explicitly addressed. Instead, the focus will be set on its core, the transformation of the energy system. Ambitious energy policy goals, reaching far into the future, now constitute the vision of the Energiewende. This transformation process, however, increasingly evokes controversial debates that may negatively retract on the comprehensive sustainability strategy (cf. section 3).

The path to a low-carbon society in Germany is guided by the goals set in three documents: the governmental energy concept presented in 2010 [4], an amendment on its energy policy passed in 2011 after the Fukushima nuclear disaster [5], and the coalition agreement between Christian Democrats and Social Democrats of December 2013 [6]. The governmental concept for Germany's future energy supply proclaims very ambitious targets: to increase energy productivity by 20% until 2020 as compared to 1990; to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by 40% (2020) and by at least 80% (2050) compared to 1990. The share of renewables in gross energy consumption is to increase to 18% by 2020 and to 60% by 2050. The share of renewables in gross electricity consumption is to rise to 35% (2020) and to 80% (2050), and the lifetime of the last nuclear reactor is limited to 2022. In December 2013, the newly formed grand coalition of Christian and Social Democrats announced that the expansion of renewable energy, which at the time already exceeded the original targets, should be slowed down and limited to so-called “development corridors”: the share of renewables in power supply was now to reach 40–45% by 2025 and 55–60% by 2035. The 2050 final target, however, is upheld.

Strongly accelerated by the feed-in law (EEG) in the electricity sector, the Energiewende and the corresponding transition process faces challenges on multiple political and economic levels. Critics claim that the decision to end nuclear power generation and the massive expansion of renewables came too suddenly, making it
