These exercises are being developed by our astronomy students under the direction of faculty. Thus, not only will introductory students use observations obtained with our CCD system, but also the astronomy majors will learn how to obtain accurate CCD images and how to develop useful laboratory exercises. Motivated students will be encouraged to undertake an observing project of their selection — in which they participate in all the steps involved in selecting a suitable object to observe, followed by obtaining, calibrating, and analyzing the CCD image. It is our hope that students will be excited by using results obtained from a research-quality instrument that is located on our campus.

3. Acknowledgment

Funding for the purchase of the CCD system was provided by a National Science Foundation-College Science Instrumentation Program grant and by Colgate University. Support for student participation in developing laboratory exercises has been provided by a Sloan Foundation grant to Colgate University. Once development of these projects is completed, we expect to make our images and exercises available to interested educators. We welcome any comments or inquiries about our CCD system or laboratory exercises.

At Appalachian State University we have been working on the development of a set of modern lab exercises that address the needs discussed above. The first of
