

Lab 3: Action Potentials

Learning Outcomes

By completion of this lab students will be able to:

1. Describe the events that lead to the generation and conduction of an action potential.
2. Describe an action potential defining terms such as depolarization, repolarization, relative refractory period and absolute refractory period.
3. Measure subthreshold, threshold, and suprathreshold stimuli.
4. Measure a neuron's response to various stimuli during the absolute and relative refractory periods.
5. Measure neuron adaptation, the response of a neuron to repeated stimuli.
6. Measure the effects of myelination and axon diameter on nerve conduction velocity.

Background

The nervous system functions by maintaining electrochemical gradients across the cell membranes of neurons. The sodium potassium pump functions continuously in the neuron to maintain sodium ions in high concentration outside the neuron and potassium ions in high concentration inside the neuron. A neuron can send a signal to another cell, called an action potential. An action potential involves opening of voltage-gated channels to allow facilitated diffusion of sodium and potassium ions down their gradients. Once open, ion channels must pass through a period of inactivity before they close. Ion channels are unable to reopen until they have closed. When sodium channels are inactive, the neuron is unable to have an action potential, a period known as the refractory period.
