Intravascular Coagulation Fedor Bachmann,1969 Life-Threatening Coagulation Disorders in Critical Care Medicine Viola Hach-Wunderle,Peter Nawroth,2012-12-06 Hypercoagulability and bleeding are problems physicians frequently encounter when treating intensive care patients The coagulation mechanism is a tightly controlled system Its balance is disturbed in conditions such as septicemia trauma shock and others The dis turbances may be local or disseminated and the therapeutic options available are limited and nonspecific limited since in most cir cumstances they may not affect the underlying disease and are si milarly independent of the pathogenic mechanism nonspecific since they cannot be specifically targeted to the problem of local or sys temic disturbance of coagulation Furthermore increased and de creased coagulability may be present at the same time Activation of coagulation may lead to fibrin deposition and decreased hemostatic capacity as seen in disseminated intravascular coagulation New diagnostic approaches for acquired disorders of coagulation have been developed and form a new basis for therapeutic strategies Despite this progress many physicians are aware of the problem that especially for intensive care patients a treatment very often has to be selected before diagnostic procedures can be completed We also know that for many diseases rare occurrence or the hetero genity of the patient population make it quite difficult to conduct clinical studies which prove that a therapeutic regimen is efficacious Thus much discussion about coagulation disorders in critically ill patients is still necessary Even so it is important to provide guidelines for handling these problems Disseminated Intravascular Coagulation European Thrombosis Research Organisation, Disseminated
