Divisional Performance. Measurement and Control David Solomons,1968 Divisional performance David Solomons,1977 Divisional Performance ,1965 Divisional Performance Djaffer Kaced,1984 Business Unit & Divisional Performance Measurement Mahmoud Ezzamel,Chartered Institute of Management Accountants,1992 This volume describes the underlying assumptions that are made in devising the most commonly used measures of business unit performance It analyzes the strengths and weaknesses of various approaches The book also presents a more radical approach involving the use of DCF based measures and considers how accounting information can be usefully supplemented by other sources of information particularly in the context of the divisionalized organization The rigorous analysis gives a balanced account of the main problems encountered in using each approach The conclusions presented in Business Unit and Divisional Performance Measurement provide a firm foundation upon which a sound management control system can be erected Key Features Analyses the strengths and weakness of various approaches Considers how accounting information can be usefully supplemented by other sources of information Advances a more radical approach involving the use of DCF based measures Modes of Divisional Control A. Scott Keating,2000 This paper uses findings from a field study of performance measurement practices in eight firms to identify and describe some of the characteristics of firms divisional and division manager performance evaluation practices Most economic and accounting theories of performance measurement focus on the use of information to evaluate managers performance ex post This research reveals that performance evaluation in the eight sample firms consists of three components i ex ante screening of potential division managers to identify candidates with preferences closely aligned to the firm and its senior managers ii ex post monitoring of incumbent division managers and iii intensive planning and budgeting processes This study also identifies an important determinant of firms divisional performance evaluation strategies namely the extent of interaction or coordination between divisions Firms whose corporate managers manage operating divisions as autonomous un related business Autonomy Promoters control divisional activity through ex post monitoring of results achieved By contrast firms exploiting synergies between divisions Synergy Exploiters supplement their ex post monitoring programs with either rigorous ex ante screening of potential division managers or intensive planning and budgeting systems More specifically Synergy Exploiters whose divisions interact and share resources directly lateral synergy exploitation use ex ante screening whereas those exploiting synergies and sharing resources indirectly through the corporate office vertical synergy exploitation use planning and budgeting systems The implications of these findings for performance measurement and control theories are discussed Divisional Performance Measurement Hatem Mohamed El-Shishini,2001 Surveys indicate that the majority of companies in the UK have adopted divisionalised organisational structure The manner in which divisions are controlled and evaluated is therefore of considerable importance However much of the research relating to divisional performance measurement is approximately 20 years old The management accounting literature distinguish between the economic performance of a division and the performance of its manager advocating that the evaluation of a manager s performance should consist only of those factors under a manager s control However empirical evidence showed that companies tend to hold divisional managers responsible for uncontrollable factors for the purpose of this research uncontrollable factors include three categories 1 uncontrollable common resources costs 2 economic and competitive conditions and 3 interdependencies among divisions This research aims to explain the factors that lead to hold divisional managers responsible for uncontrollable items In particular the research addresses the following issues 1 The extent to which companies use different measures to evaluate the economic performance of the divisions and the performance of divisional managers 2 The nature and content of the performance measures that are used to evaluate divisional managers performance 3 The level of application of the controllability principle in terms of the above three categories of uncontrollable factors 4 The role of the potential explanatory factors in explaining the observed practice They include behavioural institutional and organisational factors and 5 The relative importance attached to non financial performance measures that are used to evaluate divisional managers performance A postal questionnaire survey has undertaken to the UK based divisionalised companies during April and May 2000 A total usable questionnaire was 124 The preliminary research findings identify many different levels of the application of the controllability principle At one extreme some companies hold divisional managers responsible for all uncontrollable factors At the other extreme some companies seek to hold divisional managers responsible only for controllable factors
