Drawing Outside the Lines Lillian Ring Jacobson, 2015 Design is both a mode of communication and a collaborative process It is a powerful tool with which to convey ideas about the built environment and unlock creativity Yet urban planning has not harnessed design's potential to engage communities in participatory processes Urban design has been guarded as an exclusive realm for experts rather than a shared process that utilizes the knowledge of both professionals and community members Urban planning has long struggled to successfully involve the public in its processes and this thesis argues that participatory design is the key to meaningful community engagement in planning Participatory design is particularly important when planning in marginalized communities It provides participants with a sense of ownership over their communities and exposes the manifestation of oppression in the built environment Using Paulo Freire s idea of consciencizacion this thesis tests participatory design s ability to allow both designers and community members to gain critical consciousness and work towards social change together The research for this project focuses on marginalized unincorporated communities that have been systematically excluded from city annexation practices because of their racial and socioeconomic makeup These communities have been left under the jurisdiction of counties lacking infrastructure adequate emergency services public open spaces and sufficient political representation This thesis also explores the impact of participatory design processes on teenagers in unincorporated communities who often bear the brunt of their communities oppression and are rarely consulted in planning decisions My research concentrates on a participatory design process I conducted with high school students in a predominantly Latino unincorporated community outside of Santa Rosa California This community suffered a tragedy in 2013 when a 13 year old boy was shot and killed by a Sonoma County Sheriff in a vacant lot along Moorland Avenue The incident spurred community protests and organizing for change and led to my involvement with the neighborhood My work with the Santa Rosa teenagers revealed the importance of design in participatory processes The physical act of designing unlocked students creativity built their capacity to think spatially and feasibly and showed them the power of young people s voices in creating neighborhood change
