Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the heart rate variability (HRV) of young adults. The study was conducted in a laboratory setting. The subjects were 20 young adults (10 males and 10 females) who were randomly assigned to two groups: a control group and a training group. The control group was instructed to maintain their current level of physical activity, while the training group was instructed to engage in a 12-week training program. The training program consisted of three sessions per week, each lasting 30 minutes. The sessions were designed to improve cardiovascular fitness and reduce stress. The HRV was measured at the beginning and end of the training program. The results showed that the training group had a significant increase in HRV compared to the control group. This suggests that the training program was effective in improving cardiovascular fitness and reducing stress. The findings of this study have implications for the use of HRV as a measure of cardiovascular fitness and stress in young adults.
