Heather Settle, 2007 This dissertation examines the way hardship and uncertainty have transformed the social political and economic landscape of contemporary Cuba After the Soviet Union's collapse in 1990 Cuba suffered a catastrophic economic crisis from which it never fully recovered Almost overnight Cubans were called upon to endure rationing and shortages of basic necessities from soap to rice and spare bicycle parts in what Fidel Castro's government called this Special Period in Peacetime Yet as the crisis wore on into a second decade their sacrifices began to look less special and more permanent not a way out of the crisis but the expression of a new and durable state of affairs in the post Cold War era As the crisis a term suggesting a moment of intense but finite suffering expanded to fill the horizon of the foreseeable future I show how it began to take on its own logic and temporalities The state of perpetual hardship and want redrew the urban map and reset the revolutionary clock interrupting the teleological promises of socialism and the revolution and replacing them with the circular rhythms of opening and crackdown march and retreat It remade Cubans intimate relationships overlaying them with deep divisions between rich and poor black and white men and women true believer and cynic and all points in between Not only the economy but also politics and ethics were rocked by this experience During the first years of the new millennium emigration tourism for dollars and the passionate desire for commodities spurred by Cuba's experiments with capitalism convinced many people that even love was subject to economies of scarcity El amor se acaba went the saying Love has run out like coffee toilet paper or any other scarce commodity This dissertation is based on fifteen months of fieldwork in Havana in a working class barrio In it I map out the crisis in its economic political and ethical dimensions focusing attention not only on what it has destroyed but what it has built new routes and forms of relation subjectivities that bear the paradoxical stamp of a crisis made permanent
