

ECOLOGY OF THE GREAT SANDHILLS AND CYPRESS HILLS PLATEAU

by Jan Looman, Research Station, Canada Department of Agriculture, Swift Current

[On June 10-11, 1967 the Saskatchewan Natural History Society will hold its annual Summer Meeting at Swift Current. The following short article describes the area to which field trips have been planned.]

The Great Sandhills extend east from the Saskatchewan-Alberta border to approximately north of Tompkins. In Alberta a smaller dune area, the Middle Sandhills, is separated from the Great Sandhills by the South Saskatchewan River and a narrow strip of loamy soils. East of the Great Sandhills, small dune areas of the same formation extend as far east as Highway No. 4 north of Swift Current.

Figure 1. Bare dunes and fairly dense vegetation exist within a short distance of each other in the Great Sandhills.

The sand which forms the dunes is very fine and the absence of even small pebbles shows the aeolian character of the formation. The sand is of glacial origin; repeated reworking by wind and water have caused its present homogeneous texture. Though very dry and often very hot at the surface, the dune landscape is relatively well supplied with sub-surface water. Even in the middle of summer the sand is moist at a shallow depth, usually within the upper foot. A remarkable phenomenon in the dune landscape is the existence of almost bare dunes and fairly dense vegetation within a short distance of each other (Figure 1).

The dune landscape may be visualized as being at first a smooth layer of sand over loam or clay. The sand lets water percolate through very readily, but this water does not penetrate easily into the heavier-textured loam or clay. As a result, grasses and herbs, shrubs and trees establish readily. Where the loam or clay underlies the sand at a shallow depth, and relatively little water is held the grasses and herbs will predominate. Shrubs and trees establish in the deeper sand layers.

In periods of drought the areas occupied by grassland become desiccated; the upper layers of the sand start drifting and the sand piles up against shrubs, forming "embryonic" dunes. This process is repeated over and over again, and because several shrubs have the ability to keep growing above the sand the embryonic dunes become higher and higher, eventually becoming hills.

Obviously, this process is a very effective force in the selection of species especially equipped to survive in so rigorous an environment. In an active dune landscape several species
