

The bird flew over this scenery, looking down for a split-second. What would he see? Would he recognize the wrinkles of concern that have sneaked into the young woman's face getting off the bus. Would he care if he knew that she had lost her job three weeks ago but hasn't told anyone yet because she was ashamed? Probably not. He most likely would see nothing of importance for him. He would not wonder about the people living here, all with their own unique story. Their ambitions, dreams, worries and moments of true happiness, relationships and friendships. Did they know each other? How many times have these lives crossed during their time living here? And however opposed and distant some might seem, don't they still have some things in common? Or was there even one thing everybody had in common?

We can just hope that we will find out more soon. Throwing ourselves into the living-rooms of families, the kitchens of old ladies and the relationships and stories of these people. After all, aren't we all basically one of them?
