

Essay Example on Women in Evangelism and Faith-Based Leadership: A Theological Discourse Essay

Introduction

Modern historians continue to investigate the increasing role of women in evangelism and faith-based leadership (Gallagher, 2004). Theological discourse persistently supports the mutuality between men and women in modern Christian beliefs. Protestantism, for instance, proceeded from holding women as the "good" proverbial woman to more citizen roles. These increased evangelical roles for women peaked in the middle of the 20th Century when women theologians began to question the hegemonic patriarchy of the bible and dominant traditional Christian beliefs. The feminism movement that started to sweep the Western society in the 1970s thereby found its way into protestant non-conformist ideas and began to restructure the theological view of feminism (Baillie, 2002).

However, the term "evangelical feminism" sounds like an oxymoron (Cochran, 2005). Evangelism, in its strict interpretation, invokes the conservative images of Christianity and the traditional gender roles. Feminism questions these very roles and societal misogynistic hegemony. The theological advancement of the biblical feminism perspective in modern Christianity, however, provides grounds for an analysis of the societal restructuring from male societal dominance from the Middle Ages. In this study, Puritan womanhood shall form a foundation for studying the empowerment of women in their journey towards the successful feminism movements of the mid-20th Century.

The author shall reference the roles expressed of women in the famous Puritan allegory, Pilgrim's Progress. Overall, women in the Puritan era of Christianity are shown as more active in the domestic sphere within a repressive male-dominated society. However, the feminist perspectives of the modern woman (especially 19th-century feminism) are often linked to the Puritan womanhood perspectives. The foundational question for this study as such is; what comparisons exist between the Puritan beliefs of womanhood and the evangelical feminist? The author theorizes that Puritan Womanhood, as presented by John Bunyan in the allegory Pilgrim's Progress, laid the foundation for the increased interests in biblical feminism of the 19th and 20th Centuries.

Puritan Womanhood as Illustrated in *Pilgrim's Progress

The second part of Pilgrim's Progress follows the journey of Christiana – Christian's wife – and the children to the Celestial City from the City of Destruction (Bunyan, 1880). Christiana and her Children are joined in the journey by their neighbor – Mercy. During their pilgrimage, the women and children are accompanied by Great-heart, who serves both as their guide and protector. The spiritual journey to the Celestial City is thereby much easier for the women as the man (Christian). While Christian had met danger and exemplification of wrong all through most of his travel, Christiana meets people who are either saved or are worthy of salvation.
