

tions are difficult if one's history is generated through a series of negations or alternative models. In this book, the negations, apt as they may be, are not always sufficient to provide door to the reality that remains. Lomake's history of Hawaiian women, in other words, might have benefited, on occasion, from more substantive ethnohistorical embediment. Nonetheless, in the alternatives it rejects and suggests, her book is an important, indeed, invaluable addition to the Hawaiian ethnohistorical corpus.

Disentangling Conflict Discourse in Pacific Societies. Karen Ann Watson-Gieger and Geoffrey H. White, eds. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1990. 320 pp. $49.50 (cloth).

MARION G. SILVERMAN,
University of British Columbia

The editors of this book begin their introduction: "Tangles—interpersonal conflict, disagreements, moral dilemmas—are at the heart of social life. People talk about their troubles, and in seeking solutions through talk, they create valued images of self and community. 'Disentangling' refers to cultural activities in which people attempt to 'straighten out' their 'tangled' relations" (p. 3), and try to transform "problematic circumstances (conflict) into more ideal circumstances" (p. 3).

Ten well-presented ethnographic cases (with transcripts of disentangling events) allow a comparative analysis "by disposing the cultural assumptions that make the disentangling process compelling for participants, as well as the modes of discourse and social organization that make it possible as a collectively synchronized activity" through consideration of "the ethnopsychological" understandings about persons and emotion that frame disentangling activities as meaningful and desirable" and the "social structural forces that produce, and are reproduced by, their activities" (p. 3).

This volume is part of something of a trilogy that includes Dangerous Words: Language and Politics in the Pacific, edited by Brenneis and Myers (New York: University Press, 1984), and Person, Self, and Experience: Exploring Pacific Ethnopsychologies, edited by White and Kuleparrick (University of California Press, 1985).

These volumes contribute, respectively, insights on communicative practices and ethnotheories pertinent to disentangling in Pacific communities. The present volume contributes and extends their insights by drawing connections between the conventions of talk about sociopolitical relations and ethnopsychological formulations of person and action" (p. 3). One of the important comparative issues followed through from Dangerous Words, is how "talk" may operate differently in more egalitarian versus more hierarchical societies. Most of the contributions to the three books share exemplary standards of innovativeness, of rhetorical sophistication without theoretical pretension, of empirical groundedness, and of clear writing.

The papers follow from and are relevant to interests in concepts of self, person, and social relations, and the connections among them; discourse and speech events; genres; conflict management; dispute resolution and mediation; the dynamics of meetings and other interactional events; ethnopsychology; cultural and cognitive models; various aspects of therapy and counseling; and Oceanic ethnography.

The contributions include an introduction by White and Watson-Gieger; Buggs and Chan on the Hawaiian ho'oponopono; Watson-Gieger and Gieger on Kwana'ae family counseling (Malaita, Solomon Islands); Brenneis on the Fiji hau (an ancestor); Arno on the joking dehabe in southern Lau (Fiji); Brenneis on the gossip narratives of Niuaelaoe (Tuvatu); McKillop on Maori popular metaphors and allegory (Papua New Guinea); Lindstrom on debates on lamma (Vanuatu); Hutchins on Iriehand land litigation cases in village courts (Papua New Guinea); Duranti on the Sauwan joo; and an epilogue by Koenig.

As the issues raised in the book are pursued, one might make two interrelated suggestions. The first suggestion follows from the fact that, as the editors note, the participants in the disentangling situations described in the book generally know one another. They inhabit the same social and moral universe (and it is with us "repair" that the events are concerned). In this light, while the comparisons that some of the authors make with "Western" formal legal and psychotherapeutic settings and concepts are certainly productive, there are other comparisons that would be at least as productive (if good comparable studies are available). I am thinking of comparisons with such Western modes of counselling as pastoral counselling, where the participants may also inhabit the same social and moral universe.

It might also be rewarding to follow up on the possibility that the socially institutionalized modes of therapy, counselling, intervention, and so on, are themselves formative of the cultural concepts of person, self, and social relations.

New Directions in Psychological Anthropology Theodore Schwartz, Geoffrey M. White, Catherine A. Lutz, 1992 The field of psychological anthropology has changed a great deal since the 1940s and 1950s when it was often known as Culture and Personality Studies Rooted in psychoanalytic psychology its early practitioners sought to extend that psychology through the study of cross cultural variation in personality and child rearing practices Psychological anthropology has since developed in a number of new directions Tensions between individual experience and collective meanings remain as central to the field as they were fifty years ago but alongside fresh versions of the psychoanalytic approach other approaches to the study of cognition emotion the body and the very nature of subjectivity have been introduced And in the place of an earlier tendency to treat a culture as an undifferentiated whole psychological anthropology now recognizes the complex internal structure of cultures The contributors to this state of the art collection are all leading figures in contemporary psychological anthropology and they write about recent developments in the field Sections of the book discuss cognition developmental psychology biology psychiatry and psychoanalysis areas that have always been integral to psychological anthropology but which are now being transformed by new perspectives on the body meaning agency and communicative practice
