ABSTRACT

This article focuses on challenges associated with the use of technology foresight for developing long-term strategies for innovative uses of ICT in education with an emphasis on the role of creativity. The outcomes of two international foresight programmes on the future of education are critically examined. The findings demonstrate the need to address programme participants' capacity to engage in systematic futures thinking and to emphasise creative aspects of constructing shared visions of the future.

INTRODUCTION

Technology foresight programmes are policy-planning tools that engage key actors and stakeholders in the construction of shared visions of alternative and preferred futures. Their purpose is to help policy makers identify important technological and social developments and inform innovative, long-term policy decisions (FOREN Network, 2001). Technology foresight programmes have become popular for addressing long-term policy needs in education to meet challenges relating to increasingly rapid technological change. Influential international and transnational organisations, including, the OECD, the European Commission, and the World Bank, have actively promoted technology foresight programmes and several regional and national programmes have already been implemented (European Commission, 2009; Istaitieh & Theisens, 2013; World Bank, 2011).

A defining characteristic of technology foresight programmes is their participatory and collaborative nature. Programme planners and practitioners aim to involve representatives of all relevant stakeholder groups in the policy planning process to ensure a common understanding of the issues involved and possible pathways toward the future. The utility of programme outcomes are therefore dependent on participants' capacity to engage in constructive and critical considerations of possible impacts of emerging technologies over long
