Kennedy, 2020-04-14 Many people including some mental health professionals and service members themselves have the misconception that military deployment is highly likely to cause posttraumatic stress disorder PTSD This book gives practitioners a more nuanced understanding of military stress reactions and related mental health concerns from transient adjustment problems to clinical disorders Drawing on expert knowledge of military environments and culture Carrie H Kennedy provides vital guidance for evidence based assessment intervention and prevention Kennedy emphasizes that overdependence on the diagnosis of PTSD can lead to suboptimal care and shows how to tailor treatment to each service member s or veteran s needs A crucial addition to any practitioner s library the book is illustrated with numerous case vignettes Combat Stress U. S. Marine Corps, 2011-10-03 Combat Stress is the mental emotional or physical tension strain or distress resulting from exposure to combat and combat related conditions Controlling combat stress is a command responsibility In terms of Service members lost from action and reduced performance combat stress seriously affects mission accomplishment It is a leader s responsibility to take action to strengthen Service members tolerance to combat stress and manage it in his or her unit Combat stress reactions are the result of exposure to the same conditions during military actions that cause physical injury and disease in battle or its immediate aftermath and many combat stress reactions occur in persons who are also wounded or ill with disease Rates of combat stress casualties vary greatly with higher ratios during lengthy periods of intense combat In Okinawa 1945 during a peak month of battle the combat stress casualties among Marine Forces were reported as high as one for every two wounded in action WIA Under less lengthy periods as suggested by data acquired from the Israeli Defense Forces fighting in Lebanon 1982 the ratio of combat stress casualties to WIA in small units can be as high as one to one In the past we have generally suffered as many as one battle stress casualty for every three to five WIA in heavy fighting However highly trained units with strong leadership and high esprit de corps have fewer combat stress casualties While this manual focuses on combat induced stress reactions it is important to emphasize that combat stress is not restricted only to combat but may also arise from combat like conditions present during military operations other than war In an area of operations characterized by continuous action and high danger our forces may experience high rates of stress casualties unless small unit leaders are trained and prepared to manage stress This publication is written to inform small unit leaders of stress characteristics and management techniques in order to prevent reduce identify and treat combat stress reactions in the Service member s own unit to the maximum extent possible A significant part of training is learning to control and cope with stress Leaders must learn to cope with their own stress and then assist junior personnel in managing their stress The application of combat stress management techniques helps conserve fighting strength and provides one more step toward achieving success
