

How relevant is Marxism in contemporary international relations? Make reference to the concepts of power, the state and the global economy.

The failure of Marxism is evident in the course of international relations. However, Marxist ideology influences contemporary international relations and the existence of capitalism, a key Marxist characteristic, persists today. It is evident that Marxism remains relevant to an extent as the link between socialism and capitalism continues to influence states interactions. However the Marxist principle of equality and the ideologies quest to redistribute power evenly continues to fail in contemporary international relations. Through examining the concepts of power, the state and the global economy in international relations, it will become clear that the principles promoted by Marxism remain relevant to some extent.

Marxist principles were found with the intention of working at state level. However, in addressing whether Marxism is relevant to contemporary international relations it is necessary to assess Marxist principles on an international level. Marxism expresses the problem that the wealthy and upper class hold power and exercise their power at the expense of the lower class. Today more developed countries can be seen to symbolize people in the upper class and less developed countries symbolizing people in the lower class. Marxism's socialist principles for creating a state where all people are equal or similarly a world where all states are equal has failed, thus it is clear that the problems Marxism addressed regarding power still exist and Marxists socialist values are not practiced.

Marxism believes that imperialism is necessary in order for the masses to rise and be equal with the elite. In contemporary international relations imperialism is a common tool used by states to employ their existing powers and pursue greater powers. US intervention in Iraq at the beginning of 2003 can be cast under the disguise of implementing a democratic state and serving the interests and human rights of Iraqi citizens. However the United States has acted imperialistically in destroying the governance of Saddam Hussein. Through this example it is evident that while the same technique of imperialism appears relevant to contemporary international relations, Marxist intentions for imperialism differ greatly from those seen on the world stage today. Wallerstein links the existence of imperialism in international relations as being a development of Marxist ideas (Hobden & Wyn Jones, 2001, p.208). The world's greater powers (in this case the United States) enforce their powers not to create equality amongst states but rather to increase their own power and promote their ideologies. US intervention in Iraq promotes western ideas, democratic governmental systems and opposes totalitarian regimes such as Saddam Hussein's Iraq.

The international system is composed of a skewed balance of power and the even distribution of power proposed in Marxism is certainly not evident today. The balance of power differs according to what kind of power is being analysed, however at no point can states be seen as holding equal power between each other. Currently the international system has come to settle on a balance of power that "favours the stronger and more prosperous states at the expense of sovereign equality for all" states
