EXPANDING CONTRACEPTIVE CHOICE: FIVE PROMISING INNOVATIONS

200 MILLION

The number of women with an "unmet need" for family planning services worldwide.

Contraception is a "best buy" for development.¹ By helping individuals to choose when to have children, family planning saves lives; it prevents unintended pregnancies, averts maternal and child deaths, and prevents abortions.² Family planning also saves public sector resources; for $1 a government spends on family planning service delivery, $2 to $6 can be saved in providing other interventions, including basic health and education for fewer children, maternal health services, and improvements in water and sanitation.³

Half of married women worldwide now use a modern method of contraception, but globally 200 million women still have an "unmet need" — they would like either to stop having children or delay their next birth for at least two years, but are not using an effective contraceptive method.⁴ Unmet need is fueled by lack of information, fear of social disapproval or a husband's opposition, and concern for contraceptive side-effects or impacts on health.⁵ Unmet need can be considerably reduced by expanding access to methods that are currently under-utilized and by assuring clients that a variety of modern methods are available to meet their diverse needs.⁶ Unmet need is also being addressed through ongoing contraceptive research, which aims to improve affordability and ease of use, and to provide users with options that are more within their control. This policy brief highlights five "next generation" contraceptives, each of which offers one or more advantages over similar earlier methods (see table). These innovations are among those expected to enter the market within five years and can assist country programs to make contraception more accessible and attractive to women and couples.

Sino-Implant (II): A Much Lower Cost Implant

Contraceptive implants are flexible, hormone-releasing rods made of medical-grade silicon. These matchstick-sized rods are placed under the skin of a woman's upper arm, inserted and later removed in a quick, minor surgical procedure by a trained provider. Depending on the product, implants provide protection against pregnancy for three to five years. Although implants were developed more than 25 years ago, they remain one of the least widely available methods; more women want implants than are able to obtain them.⁷ In Kenya, where implants are the most popular of the long-acting and permanent methods (LAPMs), demand continually exceeds supply.⁸

Selected Next Generation Contraceptives

PRODUCT	METHOD TYPE	INNOVATION	TIMELINE
Sino-Implant (II)	Hormonal	Significantly lower cost than comparable implants.	Widely distributed in China and Indonesia. Currently registered in Kenya and Sierra Leone; under review by national drug regulatory authorities in eight countries, with 10 more reviews expected by mid-2010.
Depo-SubQ Provera 104 In-Inject Syringe	Hormonal	New formulation for injection under the skin rather than into the muscle; packaged in a single-use syringe to permit broader access.	Depo-SubQ is approved by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA); approval for Depo-SubQ in In-Inject syringe is expected from the European Medicines Agency (EMA) by mid-2010. ⁹ Anticipated rollout in 2011-2012.
NES-EE Vaginal Ring	Hormonal	Longer duration (12 months vs. one month) protection. Does not require refrigeration before insertion. Potential for use as emergency contraception.	Anticipated rollout in 2012, pending FDA approval.
SILCS Diaphragm	Barrier	One size eliminates need for fitting by a provider; user-friendly design eases insertion and removal.	Anticipated rollout in 2011, pending FDA approval.
Standard Days Method With Cell Phone Alerts	Fertility awareness	Users reminded of fertile period and need to abstain or use barrier method via cell phone short message service (SMS).	Concept being tested in India (2009).

⁹EMA serves a similar function in Europe in terms of the scientific evaluation of medicinal products, as does the FDA in the U.S.

contraceptive use In this study individual women are linked to the characteristics of the nearest pharmacy health facility and source of family planning to assess the importance of the socioeconomic background and the characteristics of nearby services for women s contraceptive use and fertility The results suggest that limited levels of female schooling are constraining contraceptive use particularly in rural areas Policies to raise female schooling will raise contraceptive use and lower fertility Broader availability of the pill through pharmacy outlets and of the injection and IUD in fixed health facilities is also likely to raise contraceptive use Consultation fees at health facilities do not appear to be constraining demand for modern methods
