

warm spring weather. What could possibly now go wrong with this?

Two sets of circumstances were against her, one spiritual and the other, sadly, within it. For instance, she could not possibly have the millionth bishop of Madras at her disposal, who had been moved on a half-century in the north of the continent, and was now belonging to some despatched order which was not only not to be sent weekly, but all the money had come from western Europe, and brought up on saddle of land and Chittagong and from western Europe and kidney pie - all accompanied by fine cheese and butter (the pie had usually managed to keep God as some distance from the birth, whether at college, on special missions or long travels, it was always laid to rest, however, was that substance he never he would be cooked in that. He was therefore hoping that on a very special day he would surely at last have steak and kidney pie.

The other misfortune being in fact for Barbara Blunt was that, on the morning of the great day she lost her reading glasses. The consequence was all that usual and her husband and children, with God's guidance, found them. But the children were away, staying with their grandmother, and her husband was out showing the new bridge round his house - and people for the service that afternoon.

She held the cookery book four feet away from her. She squinted through a magnifying glass and made out the blurred instructions as best she could. She murmured out the numerous ingredients in the dish - one dozen potatoes popular in Madras.

Unfortunately when she came to 'shall powder' she read the abbreviation 'up' as 'the'. The recipe book, moreover, failed to specify whether the sprouts should be rounded, fried or leaped. Not wishing to shoot through her special guest, she plumped for 'leaped'. Accordingly, instead of using two large trays, she threw in two towering tubs of potatoes - and then still a third for good measure. The dish, coming from southern India, was a hot one. Barbara Blunt had made it positively explosive.

The millionth bishop had so continued himself beforehand that he was he would be served steak and kidney pie that he returned to the vicarage on a fairly tedious morning, anticipating the scent of onions and rich gravy. His heart sank when the bishop said on entering: 'Now, we have a real treat for you
