Education and Social Change: Themes from Ontario's Past, edited by Paul H. Mattingly and Michael B. Katz. New York: New York University Press, 1975. 324 + xxxi pp.

Family, School and Society in Nineteenth Century Canada, edited by Alison L. Prentice and Susan E. Houston. Toronto: Oxford University Press, 1975 (Oxford Canadian social history series). 294 + x pp. $6.95 (paper)

Several years ago one of us wrote a letter to the Editor of this journal criticizing the inclusion of an article on an aspect of Canadian educational history which was considered to be "poorly written, biased and inaccurate." We called upon the Editor "to take steps to ensure that articles pertaining to Canadian history be previewed by competent scholars in that field before being accepted for publication." (1) It was a pleasure, therefore, when the fall, 1972 issue of the Quarterly appeared to note not only that the entire issue was devoted to Canadian educational history but also that the articles included were for the most part of high calibre. This special issue, together with some additional articles, has now appeared in book form as Education and Social Change.

The book consists of a loose set of essays which taken together attempt to achieve an historiographical breakthrough for Canadian educational history. The authors are mainly younger scholars writing under the predominant influence of one of the editors, Michael Katz, formerly an American citizen now a resident of Canada for the past decade. In fact, all but two of the authors are former students of Katz during his tenure at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education and the University of Toronto. (He is currently a member of the Department of History at York University, Toronto). Unlike the book Canadian Education: A History edited five years earlier by J. Donald Wilson, Robert M. Stamp and Louis-Philippe Audet, there was no effort in this collection to be comprehensive. Rather the key-note seems to have been to be innovative, both as a topic and methodological approach, and deliberately revisionist. Neil Sutherland in his well-written Introduction, a welcome addition to the 1972 collection, speaks of the essays as being a response to a "popular concern [for] a more systematic study of Canadian social and intellectual history." (p. xiii). Presumably this is in reference to Katz's condemnation of narrative history and his repeated insistence upon the application of sociological concepts and intellectual constructs in the writing of history. (2) Such an approach, Katz argues, allows for the formation of general statements, which in a pragmatic sense are of more immediate use to the present. The authors also show themselves as products of the late 'sixties in their highly critical approach to the matter of schooling. They have proceeded far beyond a simple rejection of the Whig interpretation of Canadian educational history as represented in the basic text The
