

final chapter which unabashedly embraces the now tired and obsolete New Democratic party-Group of 78-Veterans against Nuclear Arms-peace movement policies which include 'non-aggressive' defence, nuclear-weapons-free zones, and similar measures. His proposals for future 'policies' then fall into the trap of excessive detail and costing which become arguable and less than useful.

In proposing concentration on arms control, Langille states that 'the Department of National Defence has tended to accord it a very low priority. In fact, it is only within the last year that departmental approval was given to devote resources, personnel, and offices to this task.' That is not only close to his last point, it really is the last straw! Canadian Forces officers and Defence officials have been actively and directly involved in arms control activities since General E.L.M. Burns went to the United Nations Disarmament Commission after World War II. Serving officers have been members of delegations in New York, Geneva, Vienna, Helsinki, Madrid, Stockholm, and many other locations. For decades, a directorate of arms control policy (under various names) has operated in National Defence Headquarters, and there have been officers in the counterpart offices of External Affairs.

Mr Langille claims not to be 'anti-defence' or 'anti-military,' but his whole approach is, unfortunately, inconsistent with these claims. It is thus difficult to assess the contribution that this book makes to the much-needed discussion of Canadian defence policy.

CANADIAN CHURCHES AND FOREIGN POLICY

Edited by Bonnie Greene

Toronto: Lorimer, 1990, vi, 234pp, $34.95 cloth, $19.95 paper

This is an unusual addition to the literature on Canadian foreign policy. Not only does it focus on a largely unexplored phenomenon – the efforts of the Christian churches in Canada to influence the country's external policy, but it is also novel because it was written by nine individuals who themselves have been at the forefront of those efforts over the last two decades.
