Psychogenic fever in a patient with small cell lung cancer: a case report

Mengdan Xu, Xiaoye Zhang*, Zhaoguo Xu, Guoyuan Cui, Li Yu, Xiaoying Qi, Jia Lin and Yan Liu

Abstract

Background: Fever is common in malignant tumors. We report an exceptional case of psychogenic fever in a patient with small cell lung cancer. This is the first case report of psychogenic fever in a patient with small cell lung cancer.

Case presentation: A 61-year-old Chinese man diagnosed with small cell carcinoma on June 30, 2012, came to our department with a complaint of fever lasting more than 1 month. He had undergone chemoradiotherapy for lung cancer 6 months previously. After admission, his body temperature fluctuated in the range of 37 °C to 39 °C. Somatic symptoms associated with anxiety were obvious. A 24-item Hamilton Anxiety Scale was used to assess the patient's condition. A score of 32 confirmed a diagnosis of severe anxiety. After a week of antianxiety treatment, the patient's temperature returned to normal.

Conclusion: Psychogenic fever is common in cancer patients and deserves more attention. Patients with psychogenic fever must be distinguished from patients with infectious fever (including neutropenic fever), and tumor fever. Additionally, antianxiety or antidepressant treatment should be provided. A concern is that continual anxiety may adversely affect anticancer therapy.

Keywords: Psychogenic fever, Anxiety, Small cell carcinoma, Duloxetine

Background

Psychogenic fever is higher than normal body temperature during conditions of acute or persistent psychological stress. Psychogenic fever has been reported in patients 3–56 years old with a sex ratio of 1:1.19 (male vs female) [1]. Many studies have demonstrated that psychological stress affects core body temperature in laboratory animals, with acute stress inducing transient hyperthermia [2, 3] and repeated, chronic stress inducing persistent low-grade hyperthermia [4, 5], which facilitates a hyperthermic response to novel stressors [6]. Animal studies have suggested that the presence of  $\beta$ -endorphin, a corticotropin-releasing hormone, and noradrenaline within the brain, along with activation of the sympathetic nervous system, are involved in acute stress-induced hyperthermia [7]. Habitual hyperthermia in young women, many of whom are under treatment for neuroses, has attracted increasing interest in recent years. In some cases anxiety or tension seems to be responsible, and expression of the problem, together with resolution of difficulties causing the stress, has resulted in defervescence [8]. Such mechanisms may have contributed to the increase in core temperature ( $T_c$ ) in our patient. Pyrogenic cytokines induced by stress may increase  $T_c$  in patients with psychogenic fever. However, to date, little is known about how psychological stress elevates  $T_c$  in patients with psychogenic fever or in otherwise healthy subjects.

Patients with lung cancer, especially in an advanced stage, often manifest the symptom of fever. The most common causes for this are infection (including those associated with neutropenic fever due to radiotherapy and/or chemotherapy), followed by tumor fever induced by tumor progression or high tumor burden. Cancer is often accompanied by anxiety and depression, which results in psychogenic fever.

Though not commonly reported, psychogenic fever is one of the symptoms of anxiety and depression. To our knowledge, psychogenic fever has not been reported in patients with cancer, but we encountered what we believe to be a case in our clinical practice that is of interest. After receiving treatment with antianxiety agents, both the elevated body temperature and anxiety were significantly alleviated.
